Sanaigmore is a beach on the north west coast of Islay in the Inner Hebrides, Scotland, which I visited a few years ago. It is a striking, beautiful and raw place; on my first visit the isolated cove was being assaulted by a heavy storm which battered the beach in a dark fury. The next day, it was calm, peaceful and serene, and this stark contrast in atmosphere struck me deeply. This short piece doesn't set out in any sense to describe this particular scene in a narrative way: it's more of a quiet reflection on this most beautiful of places.
